The Greek god, *Hercules, was not only known for his strength. He was also known for his athletic skill. To encourage people to visit the temple at Olympia, Hercules held many athletic events. These included spear throwing, wrestling, boxing, and chariot races. Hercules was the umpire for the games and would award a crown of olive leaves to the winner.

During the games, one group of people stood out. They were called the Spartans and they were known for being great athletes. During the Olympic games, they won the majority of the awards. As a result, they were put in charge of defending the temple at Olympia.

The Olympic games brought a lot of attention to the temple. People left offerings at the temple and those offerings were used to make the temple more beautiful. Many parades were also held in honor of the gods during the Olympic games.

The temple was decorated with sculptures and paintings from famous artists who gave their time and talents. One of the most famous sculptures was a statue of the god *Jupiter. It was carved from ivory and decorated with gold and jewels. The gardens of the temple were also full of statues. Anytime an athlete won one of the games, a sculptor was commissioned to create a life-size statue. Those statues, along with the statues of lesser gods, filled the temple's gardens.

Athletes were not the only people who displayed their talents during the Olympic games. Musicians and poets competed as well. In between matches, they would perform their latest songs and poems for the crowds. Storytellers would also tell stories. They would then be judged on their skills.

For over a thousand years, the games took place every year. (A)The people counted down the days until the games. Men practiced for the games as much as possible, and the games became the way for the temple of Olympia to make a name for itself.
