The first time I hiked around Grand Canyon National Park, I knew I made up my mind to work there.

Now, as a park ranger for the National Park Service, I share the science, history and beauty of this natural wonder with thousands of visitors from around the world.

National parks are like outdoor museums. They preserve some of America's most beautiful and historic places. Park rangers protect the parks' animals, plants, land, buildings, artifacts and people. We have a variety of jobs, depending on where we work and what we studied during college.

Interpretive park rangers (including me) teach people about what makes each national park special and what we can all do to take care of it. We lead hikes, teach school field trips, work at visitor centers and help people stay safe during their visit. Many interpretive park rangers studied science, natural resources or history in college.

Protection rangers make sure visitors follow the rules while exploring the parks. They complete special law enforcement training to do their jobs. They may also rescue stranded or sick visitors, provide medical care, fight wildfires, and work at large events such as the *presidential inauguration in Washington.

Rangers who work in smaller parks might do many of these jobs at once.

One of my favorite parts of my job is showing children their first view of the Grand Canyon during school field trips. After walking on a trail through the forest, we arrive at the edge of a huge canyon about 16 kilometers across and 1.6 kilometers deep. Children are often amazed at the canyon's size and colors. Sometimes, they think it looks like a painting.

I also love working outdoors in many types of weather. I carry a radio, first-aid kit, water, snacks and sunscreen in my backpack wherever I go. The Grand Canyon is my office!

Park rangers wear a uniform. The flat hat protects us from the hot sun, and hiking boots allow us to walk rocky trails. The National Park Service symbol on the sleeve of our uniform shirt helps visitors recognize us so they can ask for assistance.
